Mountain Driving Has Problems All Its Own

Most auto drivers are accustomed to flat terrain, gentle curves and long sight distances, and as a result sometimes have their vacation travels end tragically on a steep mountain curve.

Because mountain driving requires special knowledge and skills the National Safety Council offers the following advice if you plan to drive in the mountains.

1. One of the most frequent causes of mountain mishaps is too much downgrade. The average flat-country driver has learned to sense dangerous speed by vibration and wind noises and to expect easy curves. In the mountains, speed may be too fast long before the speedometer or the usual danger signals give warning. Curves are torturous compared to ordinary roads. The inexperienced driver, finding himself entering a curve too fast, may brake too heavily and throw himself into a skid, he may oversteer in a panicky reaction to the pull of centrifugal force, or he may veer across the center line into the path of oncoming cars.

2. Runaway speed can result from wearing out the brakes. Using engine compression to hold the car by descending in a lower gear is the only safe practice. Brakes, when used, should be applied intermittently. Constant application builds up terrific heat which not only wears brake bands, but may expand the drums and even cause the hydraulic fluid to boil. The vapor bubbles then compress when the brakes are applied, with loss of positive action. If brakes get mushy, stop and let them cool.

3. Never let your desire to save gas lead you to coast downhill out of gear. Forget about economy. Coasting is so dangerous it is against the law in many states.

4. For the same reason, don't descend in overdrive. Incidentally, it strains an engine to climb in overdrive, so for mountain driving it is best not to use it at all.

5. Many new cars have automatic transmissions which provide less engine compression in the normal driving range than conventional gears. On steep downgrades, the control should be set in the "low" position. Once you are rolling, this will give engine compression about equivalent to the regular second gear. But change to "Low" before you start down.

6. On the subject of automatic transmissions, don't forget they may creep when the car is stopped unless the control knob is set for "Parking." So in mountain parking lots or roadside turnouts, don't leave the car to take that snapshot unless the transmission control is on parking and the parking brake is set.

7. Driving on the wrong side of the road is one of the most common causes of mountain accidents. This can result from too much speed on curves or from passing on upgrades. Sometimes it is from a psychological fear of the drop. —nervous and inexperienced drivers stay so far away from the edge of the precipice that they take their half in the middle.

8. Passing other vehicles on mountain roads is a ticklish proposition and requires more self-control than the flat-country driver commonly exercises. The only rule is—never take a chance! On winding roads you never get to see very far ahead. Downhill, it often is possible to pass safely, but there is danger in building up too much speed in your desperation to get around. Uphill, the danger is miscalculation of the accelerating and overtaking rate, which naturally is much slower than on level highways. If a driver behind you starts to pass, slow down and let him around as quickly as possible. Don't risk a pileup that may involve you.

9. Don't drink. That's a good idea anytime you are going to drive, but it's even more important in the mountains. The intoxicating effect of alcohol increases with altitude. And speaking of alcohol, it is no good for your car, either. In the thinner air of high altitudes, alcohol boils easily. Use a non-alcoholic anti-freeze if the season makes such protection advisable.

10. Stopping on the highway to look at scenery or to take pictures is dangerous. Always pull completely off the road, or use one of the observation parking areas frequently provided.

11. In the thinner mountain air, uphill driving on a warm day may heat the motor enough to cause vapor lock or radiator boil. Vapor lock is due to high engine heat causing gasoline in fuel lines and fuel pump to vaporize, so that the pump sucks on the bubbly liquid with little effect. There is nothing to do but wait until it cools, possibly hurring things along by wrapping a cloth soaked in cold water around the fuel pump. The ardioator of modern cars shouldn't boil if you are not using alcohol, if the water level is checked every morning, if the radiator cells are not clogged with bugs and dirt, and if the fan belt is properly adjusted to move the maximum amount of air. Overheating results chiefly from climbing in too high a gear. Don't take it as an affront to your car's performance if it strains on high gear. Shift—for pride goeth before a boiling radiator. If it does boil, use extreme caution in removing the cap. Shield your hand with a rag and turn it a quarter turn, which allows steam to escape without spraying boiling water.

12. In a mountain rainstorm, vacuum wipers may slow down or virtually quit on an upgrade, especially on older cars. There is nothing to do put let up on the accelerator frequently to permit a couple of wipes. Electric wipers or vacuum wipers with boosters do not present this difficulty.

13. Sudden weather changes can be extremely dangerous in the mountains — especially in early spring or late fall when unexpected snowfall is a possibility. Fogs are common, too, and require the utmost caution.

14. The usual forehandedness in preparing for a trip is especially necessary for mountain driving. The prudident driver might carry a spare fan belt, a collapsible bucket to dip water from streams, a lighting circuit fuse if his car uses them, an adequate first aid kit, a flashlight, and a package of red flares — fuses— which can be obtained in an auto supply store. The brakes should be adjusted and balanced and the pedal should have adequate reserve. The cooling system should be checked and cleaned, and the spare tire made ready for use.

15. Plan every day's trip to reach a stopping point well before dark. Then the need to hurry will not tempt you to drive too fast, you will avoid the hazards of night driving, your trip will be more enjoyable, and you'll get a better choice of hotel or motor court accomodation.

16. In strange country always pay strict attention to road signs. They are not always the same as you are used to, but they are your biggest help on strange roads. So read'em and heed'sm.

LOOKING FORWARD TO BOBWHITES

The quail hatching reports portend happy hours for the Nimrods who trod the brown autumn fields, according to Chester F. Phelps, chief of the game division of the Commission of Game and Inland Fisheries. However, Phelps warns that it is too early to forecast the quail population. "This finest of all game birds," he says, "has more natural enemies than any game species in Virginia, and we will have to keep a close tab on Bobwhite right up to November 19th."

Chick Chats

Coccodiosis is the best-known and most-feared poultry disease. It occurs almost everywhere, and in many cases it takes a heavy toll.

Caused by a tiny, one-celled protozoon, coccidiosis is a disease that is characterized by rather typical symptoms — listnessness, droopiness, drawn-in neck, and slumping posture. In the cecal (bloody) type of coccidiosis, the appearance of bloody droppings is typical.

Mortality is frequently high in outbreaks of cecal coccidiosis. The disease also causes definite setbacks to surviving birds and creates a large number of worthless culls.

The intestinal type of coccidiosis while not so deadly, nevertheless causes much economic loss among poultry-raisers. This type of coccidiosis may affect slightly-older birds and may carry on in the flock in a chronic form.

Prevention of coccidiosis depends on two things: Sanitation and medication. Poultry houses and grounds should be kept as free of filth as possible. Since the coccidia which cause the disease thrive in warm, wet surroundings, care should be taken to keep litter dry and to range chickens on clean, well-drained ground.

Preventive medication is available now which will largely prevent outbreaks of coccidiosis. Given at a low dosage in the feed or in the drinking water, these medications cost little compared to the expense of a serious outbreak of coccidiosis.

Medication for control of outbreaks is also available, of course. If given promptly at first signs of the disease, a good medication will usually check the spread of the disease quickly and will save the flock-owner a considerable amount of loss.
